A FAMOUS CLUB.

No club is so surely doomed to conten porary obscurity as a club in which news-paper men form a considerable element. This is why the Tenderloin club, though one of the most interesting in New York, very soldom gets into the papers.

The home of the Tenderloin club is on Thirty account therety in the Tenderloin Thirty second street, in the Tenderloin spears, masks, and an anazing number of other unrememberable things combining to form an impressive background to any group which may gather here.

The Tenderloin resembles a good many other New York clubs in that its membership is too busy to spend much time within its walls. But late at night, after the theatres are out, and after the newspaper men who are not tied to a night desk have got most of their 'copy,' off their minds, there is pretty certain to be a representative gathering in the room; and on one of the special nights there may be a crowd.

The Tenderion's methods of amusing itself are in some respects peculiar. It may be said that its amusements are sometimes considerably unconventional, for the ordinary forms of public amusement are, of course, exceedingly trite and unbearable to men whose life enables them to see everything. The club is always able to fall back upon private entertainments by public performers. The members summon Mille. Fougere, the charming Chanteuse Excentrique, to sing for them: Valti comes from the Eden musee to sing her Chantent novelties; Omene dances. Theatrical men appear at their best before an audience so appreciative of an artistic thing. Hermann waves his wizard wand, and some big political celebrity steals in for an hour to make a capital speech.

Inclusive as the membership of the Tenderloin might seem to be, it is in one sense exclusive enough. Cads have had a hard
